

Universal Music France loses case against streaming site

September 5 2011

Daniel Marhely, founder and general director of music website Deezer.com, arrives at the presidential Elysee palace in Paris in 2010. Deezer won a legal victory on Monday when a French court threw out a complaint by Universal Music France seeking to block the music streaming site from using its catalogue of songs.

Deezer won a legal victory on Monday when a French court threw out a complaint by Universal Music France seeking to block the music streaming site from using its catalogue of songs.

The Paris High Court dismissed the complaint in its entirety, which Universal Music France brought after Deezer continued to allow its subscribers to listen -- but not download -- songs following their contract dispute.

In 2008, Deezer concluded a deal under which it paid Universal Music France for use of its catalogue, but in May 2011 it refused new conditions including limiting its free offer to listening to five consecutive songs.

Deezer chief Axel Dauchez told AFP he was "particularly happy that the judge found that the new conditions imposed by Universal did not conform to the charter of 13 commitments" agreed by music companies and online music providers in January 2011 under the support of the government to develop legal music offerings on the Internet.

In June, Deezer restricted its free service to five hours per month at the insistence of music companies. It said the change led to it losing many free users but a five-fold increase in paying customers.

The company currently has 100,000 direct subscribers, plus another 1.3 million that subscribe via their smartphone subscription.

Universal Music France said it planned to appeal.

(c) 2011 AFP

Citation: Universal Music France loses case against streaming site (2011, September 5) retrieved 24 April 2024 from https://phys.org/news/2011-09-universal-music-france-case-streaming.html

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.