

German Parliament OKs watered-down copyright law

March 1 2013

A bill broadening copyright protections for material used on the Internet has been approved by Germany's lower house of Parliament—but without provisions that worried Google and other search engines.

Parliament on Friday voted 293-243 for the bill, which aims to protect the copyright of news articles and other material on the Internet but allows the use of "single words or small text passages" without royalties.

The language appears to address search engines' concerns that the measure would amount to a "Google tax" charging them for displaying search results with short snippets of text from articles.

Google, which had launched a campaign against the law, says it is now "watered down to avoid that danger."

The bill still needs upper-house approval, and is expected to meet resistance.

Copyright 2013 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

Citation: German Parliament OKs watered-down copyright law (2013, March 1) retrieved 30 April 2024 from https://phys.org/news/2013-03-german-parliament-oks-watered-down-copyright.html

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.