October 17 2014

They might look tasteless, but satisfied customers dub them cute and adorable. Ebola-themed toys have proved such a hit that one US-based company has sold out.

The website of Giant Microbes advertises three Ebola toys as a "uniquely contagious gag gift" that can help you "learn all about this fearsome frontpage disease."

A "great teaching tool for students of all ages," the company boasts.

But eager customers are out of luck—the toys have sold out.

"Out of stock," said the website on Friday, under a five-star rating based on 10 reviews for a stuffed toy called "Ebola," which retails at $9.95.

The "Ebola Gigantic doll" sells for $29.95 and the "Ebola Petri Dish" for $14.95.

The Connecticut-based company produces stuffed animals that look like microbes, which they call "humorous, educational and fun," selling more than 10 million all over the world.

Set up in 2002 with four products, it originally designed toys as teaching tools to help small children learn about the importance of hand-washing, but now markets over one hundred designs.

Among its offers are toys representing anthrax, black death, cancer, cholera, gonorrhoea and diarrhoea.

Hysteria over Ebola has reached fever-pitch the world over, despite repeated calls for calm as the virus has killed more than 4,500 people, most of them in Liberia, Sierra Leone and Guinea.
