

Facebook to curb promotional posts on user timelines

November 15 2014

This February 25, 2013 photo taken in Washington, DC, shows the splash page for the Internet social media giant Facebook

Facebook on Friday said it is making moves to reduce the number of promotional posts that pop up in timelines, in response to users' demands for fewer advertisements.

Beginning in January, people should start seeing fewer posts in news feeds urging them to do things such as buy products, download applications or enter sweepstakes, according to the leading social media titan.

"People told us they wanted to see more stories from friends and pages they care about, and less promotional content," the California-based social network company said in a blog post.

The change was prompted by a survey that revealed Facebook users think there are too many advertisement-like posts in news feeds.

The social media giant said it discovered that a lot of pitches that came across as advertising were actually posts from pages people had "liked," according to the blog post.

"This may seem counter-intuitive, but it actually makes sense," Facebook said.

"News feed has controls for the number of ads a person sees and for the quality of those ads... but those same controls haven't been as closely monitored for promotional page posts."

New controls are being put in place to filter overly ad-like posts, according to the social network.

But the adjustment will not change the number of ads served up to users, according to Facebook.

© 2014 AFP

Citation: Facebook to curb promotional posts on user timelines (2014, November 15) retrieved 19 April 2024 from <https://phys.org/news/2014-11-facebook-curb-user-timelines.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.