

South Korea asks Samsung to extend Galaxy Note 7 refund

September 22 2016, by Youkyung Lee

South Korea's government asked Samsung Electronics to extend the refund period for its Galaxy Note 7 smartphones that have been subject to an unprecedented global recall.

The Korean Agency for Technology and Standards, the government agency responsible for product safety and recalls, has not approved Samsung's smartphone recall plan because its measures on how to remove Note 7s already in the market were inadequate, Nam Taek-joo, the agency official, said by phone Thursday.

The agency asked Samsung earlier this week to say how long it could extend the refund period for consumers who missed Monday's deadline.

Nam said the agency made the request because "the plan to remove hazards in the markets is insufficient."

He said Samsung should come up with an alternative plan on how to better notify consumers that they can exchange their Note 7 or get a refund.

"We need more measures to actively inform consumers," he said. "It appears that consumers are not active in seeking an exchange or a refund."

Samsung Electronics did not answer emails seeking comment.

The Note 7 phone went on sale in South Korea on Aug. 19 to rave reviews, but following reports of the high-end phones catching fire Samsung stopped sales on Sept. 2 and recalled 2.5 million units.

The company cited a battery manufacturing error that caused the lithium battery to overheat or burn. It received 92 reports of the batteries overheating in the U.S. alone, including 26 reports of burns and 55 reports of property damage, including fires in cars and a garage.

The U.S. Consumer Product Safety Commission issued an official recall on Sept. 15. The commission website said consumers can get a refund or a new replacement device and it did not say if there is a deadline for getting a refund.

In South Korea, where the government did not issue an official recall, the consumers who missed the Monday deadline can now get only a replacement for their Samsung phone.

This week, Samsung began shipping new Galaxy Note 7s with rechargeable batteries that are safe to use, so consumers can hand in the old ones and get a new one.

South Korean consumers who bought the defective Note 7 began getting notifications that they can get a new one starting Monday. But employees at mobile carrier shops in Seoul said Samsung had not supplied them with enough units of the new phones, meaning some customers will have to wait to exchange their old ones.

© 2016 The Associated Press. All rights reserved.

Citation: South Korea asks Samsung to extend Galaxy Note 7 refund (2016, September 22) retrieved 19 April 2024 from

<https://phys.org/news/2016-09-south-korea-samsung-galaxy-refund.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.