

How German media attention idealizes female Ukrainian refugees

May 15 2024, by Antje Missbach and Lesley Pruitt

Credit: Unsplash/CC0 Public Domain

According to the latest available data, around 3.7 million Ukrainians are internally displaced, while nearly 6.5 million have registered as refugees globally. With 1.13 million, Germany has taken in the largest cohort.

Swift and decisive measures were taken to bring Ukrainian refugees into Germany in 2022: shortly after the Russian offensive began, Ukrainian arrivals were granted immediate employment rights and social benefits, including medical care.

Unlike other asylum seekers in Germany, Ukrainians have also been permitted to travel back and forth to their country of origin without losing their entitlements.

These expedited policy changes granted Ukrainian refugees privileges that were not extended to others. For example, in 2015, many Syrian refugees who had traveled on foot through the Balkans, Hungary and Austria were pushed back at the German border after Germany decided to reintroduce border controls.

This unequal treatment shows how Ukrainian refugees have been positioned as uniquely deserving arrivals to Europe. Ukraine's martial law also prohibits most men aged 18-60 from leaving the country, meaning the majority of international refugees are women and children.

Studies have shown that gender plays a significant role in the experiences of displaced people. It can influence policy decisions that directly affect them, and impacts how they are represented, understood and integrated into host countries.

Our research, published in December 2023, set out to interrogate how Ukrainian women are portrayed in German public media, and what this can tell us about how Germany perceives its refugee population.

Gendered depictions of Ukrainian refugees

In our study, we analyzed 79 articles on female Ukrainian refugees from two high circulation German news outlets, Der Spiegel and Die Zeit, published during the first year of the latest Ukrainian conflict. We found that the dominant discourse presents Ukrainian women in Germany as keeping children safe, and as willing, able workers who will contribute to their host's economy.

Notably, early reports also paid significant attention to Ukrainian women's aspirations, future plans, and dreams, as well as the practical compromises they make in pursuing them. Some of these attributes are emphasized in profiles that have appeared elsewhere in German media.

The welcome guest: 'Mary Poppins' refugees

We identified and explored five key characteristics that appear in the media depictions of displaced Ukrainian women: they are familiar, educated, hard-working, grateful and welcome.

One interview with Lena, a Ukrainian woman, is recounted as follows: "We are very grateful," says Lena. Every few minutes she says thank you for anything or everything."

Lena is also quoted as saying "we want to be useful for Germany and for ourselves." The article states that she wants to "learn the language, earn money and pay taxes. She wants to be a part of this society and give something back as soon as she can."

Ukrainian women are often presented as productive participants in the German labor market, or they express their aspiration to do so in the near future. Another interviewee says "I have completed my B1 German course, now B2 follows... I've already been promised a job in a hospital near Frankfurt am Main, but I still need the professional permit and a few other documents. It takes a long time."

Ukrainian women are also portrayed as willing to assist with maintaining their hosts' ideals and values of cooperation, diplomacy and education. For instance, one Ukrainian woman is quoted as saying "I myself am more useful to Ukraine when I'm here. I earn money with my work and send some of it home, among other things, I donate to the Ukrainian army."

It is crucial to note that these interviews and stories are filtered through media outlets for a German audience. One journalist's reporting on a Ukrainian woman's desire to study at university is especially telling: "It's as if the 22-year-old wanted to give a personal response to the violence unleashed by Russia in her homeland: more education, more international understanding, more Europe."

While such reporting may, admirably, aim to humanize refugees, it can lead to unrealistic expectations. Focusing on their potential for providing economic or cultural benefits can obscure the challenges they face as humans seeking shelter from conflict.

Over the course of our research, we concluded that the ideal female refugee would be something akin to Mary Poppins, from the well known Disney 1964 musical fantasy film of the same name: she arrives unexpectedly, brings little baggage, is well spoken, well mannered, and able to fit into her hosts' lives, leaving only positive impacts. She is, in her own words, "practically perfect in every way."

Idealized stereotypes cut both ways

Portrayals such as these are ultimately harmful to all displaced people. By uplifting one group, they cast a shadow on those who do not fit the bill, but they also raise expectations of the contributions refugees can make. Those who are unable to fit into this "practically perfect" category for a variety of reasons—be they economic, professional or cultural—may find themselves excluded or vilified.

Likewise, idealized constructions of Ukrainian women displaced by conflict may also work against them, obscuring the important challenges they face, such as the slow and difficult process of getting Ukrainian qualifications recognized in Germany.

Our study aims to sidestep the "common sense" ideas about displaced people that often dominate public policy and debate. These tend to focus more on what refugees can bring to the table than their intrinsic right to universal protection.

This article is republished from The Conversation under a Creative Commons license. Read the original article.

Provided by The Conversation

Citation: How German media attention idealizes female Ukrainian refugees (2024, May 15) retrieved 17 July 2024 from <https://phys.org/news/2024-05-german-media-attention-idealizes-female.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.
--