

Did the Brexit referendum politically disengage women?

December 19 2018, by Hannah Harrison

Credit: CC0 Public Domain

New research published in the European Journal of Politics and Gender claims that the Brexit referendum campaigns in 2016 did not produce high quality political engagement for women.

Drawing on men's and women's self-reported knowledge on EU politics, this new study found that the campaigns' focus on "high salience issues" such as trade, foreign policy and immigration contributed to lower levels of engagement for women during and after the 2016 referendum.

In the paper, lead academic Professor Roberta Guerrina, Professor of Politics at the University of Surrey, looks at how the two official European Union (EU) Referendum campaigns Vote Leave and Vote Remain marginalised gender, equality and social justice as campaign issues.

The EU Referendum was supposed to be a turning point for political activation and ownership in the UK, but in reality it was not a significant moment of political engagement for women. Despite expectations ahead of the 2016 vote that women would most likely vote remain at higher rates than men, there ended up being no significant gender gap in voting patterns.

The paper analyses which policies and issues the campaigns focused on, trying to understand what these tell us about the biases underpinning political debate. It found that the campaigns focused on the economy and immigration policies and less on the environment and social policy; therefore, women voted based on these salient issues. The paper also finds that the family continues to be an important point for political socialisation and engagement for "weaker publics", such as women. The paper concludes that the focus of the campaigns on "high politics" and the role of family in socialisation ultimately contributed to women's lower levels of confidence and political engagement with the EU Referendum.

Professor Guerrina conducted this research in collaboration with fellow University of Surrey academic Dr. Theofanis Exadaktylos, Senior Lecturer in European Politics, and Dr. Simona Guerra, Associate Professor in Politics at the University of Leicester.

Professor Guerrina said: "The failure of both campaigns to address issues relating to social policy, and the under-representation of women's voices in media coverage, are two of the most significant silences of the research industry that has emerged around Brexit."

Provided by University of Surrey

Citation: Did the Brexit referendum politically disengage women? (2018, December 19) retrieved 19 September 2024 from

<https://phys.org/news/2018-12-brexit-referendum-politically-disengage-women.html>

This document is subject to copyright. Apart from any fair dealing for the purpose of private study or research, no part may be reproduced without the written permission. The content is provided for information purposes only.
--